Process and Variance Modeling
Linking Research Questions to Methods in Family Business Research

First Published November 24, 2016 | editorial

Abstract

Models are an important component of research design that serve as intermediaries between theories and data, often directing decisions about methods and statistics. This article discusses the basic differences and assumptions associated with process and variance models as a way of introducing the four articles contained within this special issue of Family Business Review on "Process and Variance Methods." Specifically, we highlight three key issues regarding modeling—time and causality, measurement and operationalization, and model specification—making specific ties to the challenges often associated with family business research.

Arrangement Pattern

Volumes are arranged era wise (such as...2010's contains volumes from 2010-2017). Under a volume, issues are arranged chronologically. Articles in an issue are arranged chronologically according to first published date.

The screenshot displays the journal's navigation interface. On the left, a 'Browse by year' sidebar lists year ranges: 2010-2017, 2000-2009, 1990-1999, and 1988-1989. The main content area shows a tree view starting with 2010-2017, then 2017, and Volume 30. Under Volume 30, it lists 'Issue 1, SPECIAL ISSUE: Process and Variance Methods in Family Business Research, Current Issue March 2017, pp. 7-102'. On the right, there are two article entries. The first is 'Journal Editors' Visions, Strategies, and Experiences' by Justin W. Webb and Nadine Kammerlander, first published December 1, 2016, pp. 356-364. The second is 'Does Family Involvement in Management Reduce the Risk of Business Failure? The Moderating Role of Entrepreneurial Orientation' by Antonio J. Revilla, Ana Pérez-Luño, and María Jesús Nieto, first published December 1, 2016, pp. 365-379.
